

Arts and Sciences for Global Leaders:

Higher Education in an Age of Global Mobility

Sandro Botticelli A Young Man Being Introduced to the Seven Liberal Arts

In the current globalized and knowledge-based society, well-rounded individuals with flexibility and adaptability to the ever-changing environment are in demand. Arts and Sciences education has been a subject of increased focus in Britain and other countries with advanced higher education systems as a means to develop such competencies.

In the age of global mobility, what do society and industries expect of university education? What goals do leading overseas universities set to prepare their students for the changing global landscape and how do they put them into practice? What have they learned from their experiences?

This Symposium brings together top executives from Japan's finance and arts communities and representatives from universities with the highest reputation to address the above questions and to explore how universities can respond to society's requirements in human resources development and increase society's trust in them.
